

For businesses seeking legal services in Australia and New Zealand, ACSI offers substantial expertise and geographic coverage across the two countries.

“With its network of lawyers and related business resources located throughout nine cities, ACSI member firms are well positioned to provide advice on commercial legal issues throughout the region in a highly cost effective way,” Ms O’Brien said.

ACSI also offers an invaluable service to Australian companies which might need assistance in maximising the effectiveness of their existing legal relationships.

Ms O’Brien said that in recent years, in-house corporate legal teams had been handling escalating workloads, with the result that either more specialized in-house counsel are hired or international law firms are more often relied upon.

“Even where external specialists are still required for investment, capital markets activities and litigation, many corporations fail to maximize the most cost-and time-effective legal solutions for their businesses.

“ACSI delivers clients the best lawyers at highly competitive, below-market level pricing structures to control and mitigate unpredictable costs, allowing clients to focus on what’s most important: their business,” Ms O’Brien said.

ACSI’s Advisory Board comprises Australian barrister and ex-judge Tim Hale QC of 30 years’ experience based in Sydney; international financial services advisor of over 15 years’ experience James Boland, based in New York; and Jack Shi, an advocate of 20 years’ standing based in China.

www.attorney-consulting.com

 Posted in Technology Intelligence

Police Proceedings: Court Actions Down 7%

Slater & Gordon FY12 Half Year Financial Results

